Metathesis Reactions. In many aqueous reactions it seems that the reaction involves the ionic compounds swapping their ionic partners. For example, in the reaction involving the ionic compounds silver nitrate and potassium chloride we have: The silver cation exchanges its nitrate anion partner for the chloride anion.

The hydration of water, due to water polarity, helps keep the ions separated in the solution. However, when two aqueous solutions are mixed the anions and cations come together and form a precipitate, or gas. There are 3 types of metathesis reactions: precipitation reactions, neutralization reactions, and gas formation reactions.

Net Ionic Equations Lab - AP Chemistry - Shelly Oh

Analysis Questions. 3. The three types of metathesis reactions are precipitation reaction, neutralization reaction, and gas formation reaction. In a precipitation reaction, the product formed is a precipitate. In a neutralization reaction, the product formed is water. The net ionic equation shows how water is formed.
